Technology serves us well

Perhaps there's symbolism in the fact that the foreign language capital of the world is situated not far from the world's center for high tech communications research and development. The Monterey area and Silicon Valley are only about an hour apart by freeway, which makes us California Central Coast neighbors.

The extent to which communications technology will improve foreign language services and training is a question for futurists to explore. I think most of us would agree that the closing years of the 20th century brought accelerated changes in the field.

In the past decade or so at the Defense Language Institute Foreign Language Center, we've achieved great success in improving our programs and furthering our mission with Video TeleTraining (VTT), Satellite Communications for Learning (SCOLA) and the Internet. The reel-to-reel analog recordings we relied upon in our language labs just a few years ago are giving way to digital sound and CD-ROM.

From here, it's not difficult to envision a future in which a hand held computer issued to each student will make foreign language resident and follow-on training more efficient for students and instructors alike.

While I agree that the future holds endless possibilities, I also believe the DLIFLC mission and the nature of DLIFLC instruction will remain essentially unchanged, while instructional support will be enhanced by technology.

As I've noted in the past, I foresee a future of ever-increasing interaction among peoples of the world. I foresee a high tech future, but with technology implemented to help us to understand, to learn and to communicate.

Unfortunately, the universal translator is far from being a reality. No model to date can provide accurate contextual translations.

Therefore, as I've noted in the past, I think the need for skilled linguists will remain especially acute within the military forces of our country, as proven repeatedly in the century that has just ended.

I don't think technology will supplant language skills, and I part company with those who foresee linguists replaced with computers.

Rather, computers will support linguists and enhance their capabilities.

I think those of us who might have the privilege of revisiting DLIFLC much later in the century will find then, as now, and as in years past, students who interact in small-size classes that are conducted by instructors with native proficiency.

The nature of our requirement, producing operational linguists for Department of Defense requirements, demands the quality that only instructors in the classroom can provide.

Military community honors fallen leader

North-South Road on the Presidio of Monterey Annex no longer exists. The military community honored the late Lt. Gen. Jim Moore, a former 7th Infantry Division and Fort Ord commanding general, with a memorialization ceremony by the Drill Sergeant Statue Jan. 29. Members from the Fort Ord Area Retiree Council served as ushers for the event. North-South Road became Gen. Jim Moore Boulevard. About 150 people, mostly retirees, attended the ceremony. Moore died one year ago from cancer.

Col. Daniel Devlin, commandant of the Defense Language Institute Foreign Language Center and commander of DLIFLC and POM, hosted the ceremony and introduced the guest speakers. Retired Chaplain (Col.) Steve Doman gave the benediction after the DLIFLC Joint Service Color Guard posted the colors.

Guest speakers included Leon Panetta, the former chief of staff and director of the White House Office of Management and Budget for President Bill Clinton; Rep. Sam Farr, D-Carmel; retired Lt. Gen. Robert Ord III; and retired Maj. Gen. William Gourley.

"This is a tribute to a dear friend who was a good leader and citizen who was blessed with the unique quality of leadership," said Panetta. "General Moore tried to save Fort Ord from closure. He appeared before the Base Realignment and Closure Commission hearings in San Francisco to save Fort Ord, but he lost that battle.

"Then he led the effort to reuse Fort Ord for civilian use," Panetta continued. "He led the Fort Ord Reuse Group, documented ideas and set up county panels to convert Fort Ord to civilian use. His legacy is forever an inspiration to continue to make this a better community and nation. For that, there can be no greater tribute."

Farr mentioned that Moore's military funeral at Arlington National Cemetery was one of the most beautiful ceremonies he has ever seen.

He also mentioned only his wife, Joan, exceeded Moore's meticulous attention to detail.

"Jim Moore had a passion for this base, community, land and people of the Monterey Peninsula," said Farr. "The cornerstone of the Fort Ord reuse was the new university, which Moore fully supported and understood, perhaps more so than other people."

Ord served twice with Moore, once in Vietnam and again in Korea. Each time Moore mentored his officers and noncommissioned officers and always cared for his soldiers.

"Jim Moore had a calm and inner serenity about himself and soldiers," said Ord. "He was a good man, person and soldier. First of all, Jim Moore was a man of values who possessed both moral and physical courage. As a major, he commanded a battalion in Vietnam, where I served under him and earned the Silver Star. Moore took care of his soldiers, led by example and mentored his officers and soldiers. When he spoke, others listened. He was not a phony person: what you saw, you got. He made soldiers feel proud to serve with him."

Ord, Gourley and Moore served on the Fort Ord Alumni Association executive committee together. Gourley and Moore both played key roles in getting the Veterans Affairs clinic located and opened at the former Fort Ord, especially with the closure of the former Fort Ord hospital. They were both instrumental in laying the groundwork for the Monterey Regional Health Development Group; which proposed Cypress Knoll retirement community to be built on the Patton Park village on the newly named Ord Military Community.

The Drill Sergeant Statue was a fitting place to hold the memorial dedication ceremony to honor Gen. Jim Moore. As a colonel stationed at Fort Ord from 1973 to 1976, he commanded an infantry basic training brigade and later the 1st Brigade of the reactivated 7th Infantry

The military community honors Lt. Gen. James E. Moore Jr. by renaming North-South Road as Gen. Jim Moore Boulevard in ceremonies by the Drill Sergeant Statue at the former Fort Ord Jan. 29. (L-R) Guest speakers included Leon Panetta, former White House chief of staff and director of the Office of Management and Budget; retired Lt. Gen. Robert Ord III; retired Maj. Gen. William Gourley, the chairperson of the Fort Ord Area Retiree Council; and Rep. Sam Farr, D-Carmel.

Col. Daniel Devlin, commandant of the Defense Language Institute Foreign Language Center and commander of DLIFLC and the Presidio of Monterey, addresses the audience during the dedication of Gen. Jim Moore Boulevard. The ceremony took place by the Drill Sergeant Statue on the recently renamed Ord Military Community Jan. 29. North-South Road changed to Gen. Jim Moore Boulevard to honor the fallen leader, who served as 7th Infantry Division and Fort Ord commanding general from 1982-1985.

Division. He and other soldiers contributed funds to build the drill sergeant statue as a tribute to the many soldiers who trained raw recruits into fighting soldiers.

"Before Fort Ord closed, Fort Jackson people wanted to move the statue to Fort Jackson, South Carolina," said Gourley. "General Moore stepped in and said no to the Army brass, so the statue remained at Fort Ord. After the statue was relocated to the area by the chapel, Moore was the first person to raise the American flag over the memorial area and the statue."

After Gourley finished speaking, he, Devlin and Gen. Moore's wife, Joan, unveiled a replica of the new street signs bearing the new name, Gen. Jim Moore Boulevard. While this happened during the ceremony, Department of Public Works personnel simultaneously uncovered all the new signs along the former North-South Road. As attendees drove away from the Drill Sergeant statue and chapel area after the ceremony, they saw all the new signs already in place.

Airman 1st Class Aaron Pluto, a Russian student from the 311th Training Squadron, played "Amazing Grace" on his bagpipes just before the colors were retired to end the ceremony. Pluto has been playing the bagpipes for the past six years and mentioned it was an honor for him to play during the memorialization ceremony.

Members of the POM memorialization committee coordinated and planned the event in early December. Special thanks go to Tony Barcinas and his crew at the Directorate of Public Works for making the road signs and having the new Gen. Jim Moore Boulevard street signs in place when the ceremony concluded. Afterward, there was a reception at Gen. Stilwell Community Center.

After promotion to major general, Moore returned to Fort Ord and commanded the 7th Infantry Division and Fort Ord from 1982 to 1985. During his tenure, he laid the groundwork for the conversion of the division into the Army's first and premier light division.

Moore received his third star in 1985, went to the Republic of Korea and then commanded the Combined Field Army with Republic of Korea and United States soldiers along the Demilitarized Zone in Korea for two years.

Moore became the Commanding General, Sixth U.S. Army, at the Presidio of San Francisco in May 1987 and remained there until his retirement in July 1989 after more than 35 years of active service.

Then he and his family settled in the Salinas Valley and continued his service to the nation. For several years after his Army retirement, Moore served as the volunteer coordinator for the Fort Ord Task Force, which became the Fort Ord Reuse Group, to find civilian reuses for the 28,000-acre former Army installation. FORG evolved into the present day Fort Ord Reuse Authority.

Moore also chaired a blue ribbon committee on health care issues related to the closure of the Silas B. Hays Hospital at Fort Ord. He served as a board member of the Monterey Regional Health Development Group, or MoRehealth, and the Fort Ord Alumni Association.

His wife, Joan, seven children and 11 grandchildren survive Moore.

(L-R) Leon Panetta, the former White House chief of staff and director of the Office of Management and Budget; Joan Moore, the wife of Lt. Gen. Jim Moore Jr.; and the seven Moore children were the honored guests for the dedication ceremony.

Staff Writer

(Editor's notes: The following is an Interview with Command Sgt. Maj. Cynthia Pritchett, the senior enlisted advisor for the Combined Arms Center and Fort Leavenworth, Kan., who visited the Defense Language Institute Foreign Language Center in October. She talked about the CAC mission, training, women command sergeants major, soldiers' concerns and upward mobility. Pritchett first visited DLIFLC in 1997, shortly after she assumed her current command-level assignment).

Q: What Army installations come under the Combined Arms Center umbrella?

There are nine now. There is Fort Benning, Ga., which has the Infantry Center and School; the Armor Center and School at Fort Knox, Ky.; the Field Artillery Center and School, Fort Sill, Okla.; the Air Defense Center and School at Fort Bliss, Texas; The U.S. Army Sergeants Major Academy at Fort Bliss; the Military Police, Chemical and Engineer Schools at Fort Leonard Wood, Mo.; the Aviation Center and School, Fort Rucker, Ala.; the Signal Center and School at Fort Gordon, Ga.; and the Defense Language Institute at the Presidio of Monterey.

Q: How does the CAC role differ from the Training and Doctrine Command role. How does CAC fit into this scheme?

All of these schools are the combined arms schools. Combined Arms is made up from combat arms and combat support schools and units. The Sergeants Major Academy and the Defense Language Institute support combined arms with training and leadership development and the overall military intelligence with language support around the world for field commanders. We are responsible for leader development in those war fighting collective tasks.

Q: What exactly is the main mission of the Combined Arms Center?

The main mission of the Combined Arms Center is to educate officers in the art of command and staff functions for combined arms at the tactical level and to educate officers in the operational art of war. We also have the responsibility for writing war-fighting doctrine at the divisional and corps levels. We also have the training development functions for leader development and battle command throughout the Army. We also do the experimentation for the concepts methods and procedures for that command. We are also responsible for running the operations groups at the Joint Readiness Training Center at Fort Polk, La., and the National Training Center at Fort Irwin, Calif. We oversee those collective-training exercises.

We can do it through battlefield simulation and also go to the dirt field at JRTC and NTC to run it. The Battle Command Training Program first does the simulation exercises with leaders from brigades to corps, and then the officers do their actual dirt training exercises in the field. So, it's a combination of simulation and dirt training.

Q: I understand you are one of the elite women command sergeants major in the Army. About how many does the Army have?

We have about 48 women CSMs now, but that number fluctuates on any given day, depending on retirements and who gets activated into command sergeants major positions. Currently, there are four females in general officer nominative level CSM positions, which are at CAC, West Point, the Army Material Command and at Madigan Army Medical Center at Fort Lewis, Wash.

Women command sergeants major are proud and making our way slowly to the different positions. There are 101 nominative-level general officer positions where sergeants major can serve. It takes time to grow and develop sergeants major.

It took time to develop and train potential women sergeants major. We've come to that group where we have developed women sergeants major. Now, they're here and through their own merits are getting positions. I was selected on my merits and qualifications.

Early on in my career, I felt that I had to prove myself every time I went from one level to the next. Women sergeants majors were small in numbers and relatively unknown and had never worked with many senior leaders before. You become part of the unknown quantity and people begin to test you.

Q: You divided your Army career between staff positions and working with troops in the field. Which do you prefer?

I always like being around soldiers. That's the heart and sole of what we do in the Army. Soldiers are the ones who make you successful, and they execute what you tell them to do. But at the same time, I understand that to be a well-rounded soldier, and understand how things work, you have to go between both. I would say most soldiers would rather be with other soldiers every day in the field, but it's important to have staff positions and understand what they do and how they support soldiers. You have to understand that people who work in staff positions are soldiers, too. I, like most noncommissioned officers in the field, would rather be with soldiers.

Q: When you visit other installations and talk with junior enlisted soldiers, what are their main concerns?

Most are in the training base going through some type of training, so some of their main concerns are that they get quality training and making sure they have the equipment they need. They are concerned with their quality of life issues. Permanent party soldiers not in a training status are concerned with quality of life, barracks living, their pay and allowances, educational benefits, long hours and frequency of schedule changes. Other young soldiers in Table of Distribution and Allowances units are concerned about getting to annual weapons qualifications training and other things that will help them advance in their soldier skills and get promotion points.

Senior noncommissioned officers are concerned about properly training their soldiers with the necessary equipment, the impact of training and the impact of drawing down and reducing the size of the Army. They are very vocal of having to do more training and tasks with fewer people, the lack of proper equipment to train their soldiers and the erosion of benefits and quality of life.

The most constant concern across the board is TRICARE medical services, which is getting a lot of attention from the Army Chief of Staff. TRICARE complaints from service members and family members are long waiting lines, and long delays in TRICARE paying medical bills for family members. Other TRICARE complaints include insufficient numbers of civilian health care providers available to treat family members. Since TRICARE is now our medical system, we have to find out ways and methods to make TRICARE better and more efficient for soldiers and family members. Another TRICARE concern is re-registering with TRICARE staff at a new installation each time you relocate from one installation to another, but this is necessary to re-enroll in the system.

Q: How would you compare today's soldiers with those of 10 years ago? Are they better trained now?

I think our training always gets better, but now we are more technologically advanced. We can't judge people from previous generations.

Today's young soldiers want and need a sense of belonging to a team. They ask more questions of why something is important or has to be done a certain way. The more you understand something, the more you accept it and are willing to do a certain job.

Q: What advice do you give senior NCOs to aim for future sergeants major or command sergeants major positions?

I tell them to do their job to the best of their abilities, take care of their soldiers, and great things will come to them. Being a senior NCO is about selfless service. We all want upward mobility, we all want to move on.

My leaders recognized something in me based on how I did my job, how I took care of my soldiers and how I executed my mission. These leaders recommended me for positions of greater responsibility. That's the way it should be, instead of me out there trying to manipulate and finagle and work my way to the next job.

If you do your job and take care of soldiers, they in turn will perform the missions and make you look good. Those are the things that will get you recognized and promoted. It's a very slim pyramid once you get into the command sergeant major arena. It only goes up one sergeant major of the Army at the top.

Everybody might want to strive to be him or her, but there is only one. How do you get there? Your senior leaders have to recognize what you do for that command, for that command's soldiers. Then, they in turn recommend you for those greater positions of authority and responsibilities. Do your job every day to the best of your abilities, and good things will come to those who take care of their soldiers.

Part of it is being in the right place at the right time, a little bit of luck. Do what the Army asks you to do, go where the Army wants you to go, accept the good assignments with the bad ones for you and do your best. Make sure your military records maintenance is good and everything you have done is recorded in your records. Check throughout your career for accuracy of assignments, promotions and awards.

Q: One final question. I understand you are the Army's senior enlisted advisor to the Defense Advisory Committee on Women in the Services or DACOWITS. What exactly is your role in this committee?

This is a committee that works for the secretary of defense and provides feedback to him. It's a group of 30 individual civilians who go out and visit military installations. From the issues they have heard from soldiers, sailors, airmen, Marines and Coastguardsmen in the field, they come together to discuss if they need more information about different topics, in order to provide recommendations to the secretary of defense.

Military representatives represent the active forces, Reserves, National Guard and all the military services. For the military representatives, our role is to make sure that as the committee members takes on these issues, they understand the issues. We help them develop the questions they need to ask soldiers and other service members in the field. Most civilian committee members come from a background that is not military.

Staff Writer

Retired Maj. Gen. Roland Lajoie, the first director of the On-Site Inspection Agency, addressed the graduating class of the Defense Threat Reduction Agency Intermediate Russian class at Nicholson Hall Dec. 2. Eight noncommissioned officers from the Army, Navy and Air Force received their diplomas after completing the 36-week intermediate class.

Graduates included Air Force Master Sgt. Thomas Hoopes, Navy Petty Officer 1st Class James Lindsey, Army Staff Sgts. William Alexander, Jennifer Bloomer, Jeffrey Revock, and Dee Ann Zukowski, and Army Sgts. James Phillips and Andrea Tanner.

Lajoie presently heads the United States-Russian Joint Commission on Prisoners of War and Missing in Action Affairs. Prior to that, he was a special advisor to the Deputy Secretary of Defense and helped establish the Defense Threat Reduction Agency, the successor to OSIA.

"In my current position working the POW/MIA issue, I'm quite impressed today with the quality of linguists in the DTRA program," said Lajoie. "It is an excellent program and we recruit the best linguists that we can. Having been around DLI and its language training for such a long time, I know about foreign language fluency and proficiency and how important it is.

"Graduates of today's course will be immersed in that environment in DTRA positions in Washington and around the world," Lajoie said. "Today's graduates will be on inspection teams sent to different embassies as proficient linguists and highly disciplined noncommissioned officers. You will collect information on all kinds of people, such as military and civilians. You will have the responsibilities in your jobs and deal with Russian officers at inspection sites."

The United States and the former Soviet Union signed the Intermediate Range Nuclear Forces or INF Treaty in December 1987 to verify the destruction or stockpiles of nuclear weapons in both countries. To help monitor the treaty implementation, the United States formed the On-Site Inspection Agency in January 1988. OSIA changed to the On-Site Inspection Directorate of the newly formed Defense Threat Reduction Agency in October 1998.

When OSIA began, its leaders called upon the Defense Language Institute Foreign Language Center to teach a specialized intermediate Russian course for linguists to monitor the treaty specific program. Linguists served as interpreters and inspectors in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe and later as escorts for Russian inspectors in the United States. Americans were verifying Russian treaty compliance and Russians monitored our treaty implementation progress.

Lajoie also spoke at the 1987 dedication of Nicholson Hall, named after Lt. Col. Arthur Nicholson, a former Defense Language Institute Foreign Language Center Russian foreign area officer. A Russian soldier killed Nicholson in March 1985 when he was assigned with the U.S. Military Mission in Potsdam, East Germany. At the time, Lajoie was Nicholson's commanding officer.

"The Military Liaison Mission was a unique military organization located in Potsdam," said Lajoie. "It owed its existence to the Potsdam Conference of 1945, which stated the four occupying powers would exchange liaison officers so each headquarters team would know what the others were doing all the time. Our job in the liaison mission was to make sure there was no indication of trigger-happy Russians waiting to pull those triggers.

"We said that East Germany was not so much a country with an army, but an army with a country," Lajoie said. "East Germany was a country the size of Ohio and the Russians had 20 divisions stationed there during the Cold War. Military development and training were in your face all the time. You couldn't avoid it."

Gen. Lajoie mentioned Nicholson started his Russian studies at the Naval Postgraduate School. Then he graduated from a Russian language course at DLIFLC and went to follow-on training at the U.S. Army Russian Institute in Garmisch, Germany. Col. Daniel Devlin, the DLIFLC commandant and commander of DLIFLC and the Presidio of Monterey, was Nicholson's classmate in all three places. After this advanced language training, Nicholson went on to his assignment at Potsdam.

"Mission members in Potsdam were given jobs to find out as much as they could about Russian soldiers, training, and culture as they could," said Lajoie. "Nicholson was a good linguist and a serious student about all things. He was interested in the language, the people, culture and customs. He took a much broader look at things Russian than other linguists did. He was always looking for extra things to broaden his knowledge and understanding of the Russian people.

"In fact, Nicholson was one of the few linguists who would go to the Soviet Army officers club in Potsdam and talk with some of the Russian officers," said Lajoie. "Many of them were amazed an American Army officer would go to their club and converse with them. That took a lot of guts on his part to do this." Nicholson and his driver were on a routine mission near a Russian training area when a Russian soldier killed them March 24, 1985. Nicholson received a military funeral and was buried at Arlington National Cemetery.

After Lajoie finished speaking, Air Force Master Sgt. Thomas Hoopes addressed his classmates in English while Army Sgt. James Phillips translated into Russian. Phillips later received the first annual Lt. Col. Arthur Nicholson excellence award for being the outstanding linguist in the class.

"The first few days of the course were hectic and brutal," they said. "We suffered a staggering defeat at the hand of a rapid-fire listening comprehension exam. We developed a glassy-eyed stare of cattle being led to slaughter as we discovered line by line the constitution of the Russian federation. We hauled together under the onslaught of the peculiar tapestry of fact, fiction and the occasional tall tale that combined to create the history of Russia.

"During those first few weeks, as the pressure began to ease, we started to realize that our instructors were the ones trying to save us," they said. "We learned that you can fake your way through a Russian conversation using the ever-growing supply of terrific allies called cognates. During our security classes, we learned what schizophrenics have known for a long time: a simple trip to the store can be a terrifying experience. Some of us even learned grammar. We leave Monterey once more, headed into the great unknown of the Defense Threat Reduction Agency. There will be plenty of time in the coming months to learn about our new duties and responsibilities."

After the speeches, Dr. Mahmood Taba-Tabai, the dean of European School II, and Irene Baratoff, chairperson of Russian Department A, presented the diplomas to the graduates.

In 1998 Lajoie held two civilian positions with the deputy assistant to the Secretary of Defense. In one job, he was the program manager for the Cooperative Threat Reduction and responsible for implementing the Nunn-Lugar initiative mandated by congress in 1991 to assist the former Soviet Union in the reduction and elimination of its weapons of mass destruction and other related nonproliferation efforts. For the other job, he helped organize and set up the Defense Threat Reduction Agency.

Lajoie is a fluent French and Russian linguist. For one active duty tour, he was the deputy director for international negotiations, in the J-5 or civil affairs office for the Chiefs of Staff at the Pentagon. He served other active duty tours as an U.S. Defense Attaché at the American Embassy in Paris and as an assistant military attaché at the American Embassy in Moscow.

He also commanded the U.S. Army Russian Institute in Garmisch, Germany, and the 1st Psychological Operations Battalion at Fort Bragg, N.C. His last active duty assignment was as the Associate Deputy Director for Operations/Military Affairs for the Central Intelligence Agency after the Persian Gulf War. He served as a liaison between the CIA and the Defense Department.

DLIFLC volunteers support National Kidney Foundation Golf Tournament

Staff Writer

Defense Language Institute Foreign Language Center military members and family volunteered for the fourth straight year to support this major golf tournament Jan. 14-17. This event was the Cadillac Invitational National Finals Golf Tournament, which benefits the National Kidney Foundation. Teams came from all over the United States to play in this charity event.

Retired Warrant Officer 4 Rick Howard returned to the Monterey Peninsula from terminal leave to help organize the tournament and volunteers. He retired Feb. 1 after serving as the training officer and assistant officer-in-charge for the Institute's Naval Security Group Detachment, which is now the Naval Technical Training Center Detachment.

"I can not thank the men and women of the DLI enough for their efforts this year," said Howard. "There was a significant change in the format and the weather was a factor. We really pulled together at the last moment with help from the 229th Military Intelligence Battalion. Next year we will do even better."

About 370 DLIFLC students, mostly sailors lead by Chief Petty Officer Steve Orologas from the Navy Detachment, kept score for the 107 four-person golf teams. Scorers verified the number of clubs in each golfer's bag before the event started and kept score as each team went from hole to hole. The Institute's volunteers are not allowed to drive the golf carts, carry bags or remove the flags at the holes. Their only function is to keep score for the foursome for the entire round of golf.

When the tournament begins each day, golf foursomes tee off from different holes simultaneously in a shotgun start. Scorers record the name of the first person teeing off for each hole and keep track of the team's score for each hole. After each golfer hits his tee shot, the golfers get to their ball placement and select the best approach for the second shot. All four golfers hit from the same location for their next shot. This process is repeated for each subsequent shot until the ball goes into the hole on the green.

Although each team member plays the different shots, only the overall team score counts. For example, if all team members take six shots to hit the ball in the cup or hole, the team's score for that hole is six. Or it could be four or five. Golfers played the four difficult courses at Pebble Beach Golf Links, The Links at Spanish Bay, Del Monte Golf Course and Bayonet Golf Course.

"I love being with the golfers and talking with them," said Petty Officer 2nd Class Shane Fleck, a permanent party sailor. "I've volunteered with previous golf tournaments and enjoy the break from the normal routine of classes."

Jim Breaux was the official starter at the Bayonet and Black Horse courses. He made sure golfers went to the proper hole and tee, instead of wandering off course or ending up in the adjacent Black Horse course.

"I used to work at the DLIFLC learning center from 1980 to 1987, so I am familiar with the Institute and the students," Breaux said. "If players want help, they use local caddies. Some golfers use caddies' expertise and familiarity with the courses to help them read the greens and select proper clubs, especially if they have never played on a golf course before."

The Cadillac Invitational is the largest corporately sponsored charity-based golf program in the country, according to the program brochure. Cadillac has been sponsoring the National Kidney Foundation charity for the past nine years.

Preliminary rounds of the Cadillac Invitational Golf Tournament normally attract more than 18,000 golfers who play in 125 amateur scramble events around the country. Winners compete in the finals at Pebble Beach. Last year, these charity events raised more than $6 million for the National Kidney Foundation. Funds help prevent kidney and urinary tract diseases, improve the health and well being of patients and families affected by these diseases and increase awareness of organ transplants.

One of the highlights of the weekend was the first ever presentation of National-level awards recognizing organizations that support the Kidney Foundation Golf Tournament. Awards were presented to the major corporate sponsors. A special presentation was given to the men and women of the Defense Language Institute Foreign Language Center in recognition of their outstanding volunteer efforts over the past four years, mentioned Howard. Col. Peter Dausen, the Presidio of Monterey's garrison commander, and Lt. Cmdr. Frank Rochefort, officer-in-charge of NTTCD, accepted the award on behalf of Col. Daniel Devlin, DLIFLC commandant and DLIFLC and POM commander. Both Dausen and Rochefort expressed their gratitude and a strong desire to continue to support this tremendous tournament.

DLIFLC volunteers rotated among the golf courses, so they got to see all four layouts and made friends with the different amateur golfers.

Staff Sgt. Jeralene Fernandez Gomez

On Jan. 21, Jeralene Fernandez Gomez was promoted to the rank of staff sergeant in the United States Air Force under the Stripes for Exceptional Performers (STEP) Program. A STEP promotion is rare and extremely select—awarded to only a few of the very best in the Air Force. Sergeant Gomez's outstanding professionalism, devotion to duty, and exceptional accomplishments enabled her to earn this new stripe while competing for it against every AFELM in the Air Force. This distinct accomplishment recognizes that Sergeant Gomez represents the very best of our enlisted force and has made many positive contributions to DLIFLC, the Presidio of Monterey, and the local community. The AFELM extends Staff Sgt. Gomez its warmest wishes for continued success in her Air Force Service. (Photo by Sgt. 1st Class David K. Dismukes)

Instructor remembers John Aiso

By Shigeya Kihara
Special to the Globe

(Editor's note: Shigeya Kihara is one of the four original Japanese language instructors who started out with the Fourth Army Intelligence School at Crissy Field, Presidio of San Francisco, in October 1941. Kihara relocated with the school in June 1942 to Camp Savage, Minn. near Minneapolis-St. Paul, when the school changed its name to the Military Intelligence Service Language School. The school went to nearby Fort Snelling in 1944 and remained there until 1946 when it moved to the Presidio of Monterey and changed its name to the Army Language School. Kihara came to the Presidio and remained until his retirement in 1974. In addition to being a Japanese language teacher at Crissy Field and Camp Savage, he served in several other capacities. He was the language division chairman from 1943 to 1960, then chairperson of the first Research and Development activity at the Presidio of Monterey from 1960 to 1971. Then in 1971 he became the chief of the Support Division of the Systems Development Agency, which oversaw the printing plant, the media branch for illustrators, sound recording specialists and the supply function for distribution of language material. After his retirement in 1974, he helped establish the Yankee Samurai exhibit in Nakamura Hall and lives in Monterey).

In June 1941 the War Department ordered Lt. Col. John Weckerling, an intelligence officer stationed in the Panama Canal Zone, to proceed to the Headquarters, Fourth Army, Presidio of San Francisco, to establish a Japanese language military intelligence school.

The school became the first foreign language military intelligence school since the American military was formed in 1775.

There were no precedents, no models and no theories regarding the organization of such a school. It is not surprising that the War Department did not provide Weckerling with one page of directions or instructions.

Pfc. John Aiso was discharged from the Army at the Presidio of San Francisco at 7:30 a.m. on Oct. 15, 1941. That same day at 8 a.m., Weckerling appointed Aiso to be chief instructor of the Fourth Army Intelligence School.

At 8:15 a.m. on Oct. 15, 1941, Weckerling took his newly hired faculty from the manicured headquarters area of the Presidio of San Francisco across some railroad tracks. The group ended up at an abandoned, corrugated-tin airplane hangar at Crissy Field on the Presidio along the shores of San Francisco Bay.

The new school's administrative staff stood in the background, waiting for instructions as two carpenters banged away, creating three classrooms and offices.

There was no desk, chair, telephone, pad of paper, or a pencil in the hangar. On a GI cot, was a set of Japanese language textbooks brought back to the United States by Capt. Kai Rasmussen, a former military attaché student of Japanese at the United States Embassy in Tokyo. The books included a set of "Naganuma Readers," Volumes I-VII, bilingual dictionaries, "Sakusen Yomurei" (operations manual), "Oyo Senjutsu" (applied tactics), and a United States Army Manual, TM 30-480, "Handbook on Japanese Military Forces."

Weckerling told Aiso, "Sixty students will be reporting to the school in two weeks. Be ready to start training." Then Weckerling did an about face and left the hangar.

At 8:30 a.m. on Oct. 15, John Aiso, a Japanese-American Nisei and civilian had been put in charge of organizing a Japanese military intelligence school for United States Army students, with no written directives and no oral instructions. The responsibility for working out the specifics and details of a critical War Department operation had been placed on Aiso's shoulders.

It was a make or break situation, but Aiso, a man of strong character and a born leader, highly educated and experienced, was equal to the challenge.

He sent his staff to find office supplies, equipment and to find a printer to reproduce 100 copies of the "Naganuma Readers".

Aiso sent Shig Kihara to the University of California at Berkeley and Stanford University bookstores and the Goshado Japanese bookstore in San Francisco to buy all of their Japanese dictionaries.

He supervised Oshida, Tetsu Imagawa and Kihara in their translation of TM 30-480 into Japanese to serve as a Japanese military terminology text for the course. Oshida had the best handwriting, so he was directed to cut stencils as the pages were translated one by one.

Aiso developed a program of instruction and scheduling, which included reading, translation, "Kanji" (Chinese characters), English to Japanese translation, interpreting and "Heigo" (military terminology), hour by hour for each day of the study week.

Weckerling came in each day, sometimes twice a day to monitor Aiso's ideas and plans and to approve or disapprove each action. Capt. Rasmussen came in regularly from his post at Fort Winfield Scott, on the Presidio of San Francisco, to observe and comment on Aiso's preparations for the course.

Sixty students reported to the Crissy Field hangar at 8 a.m. on Nov. 1, 1941, to begin the first classes of the Fourth Army Intelligence School.

In May 1942 the Fourth Army Intelligence School graduated its students, who were ordered to the Alaskan, South Pacific and Southwest Pacific Theaters to perform combat intelligence. The school was transferred to Minnesota in June 1942, renamed the Military Intelligence Service Language School, and because intelligence was so critical in the war against Japan, it was placed under the direct jurisdiction of the War Department.

Appointed Director of Academic Training, John Aiso turned out 6,000 linguists by the end of World War II, who contributed significantly to victory in the Pacific and Asian Theaters.

Japanese Basic Course student wins speech honors

Story by Joe Morgan
Staff Writer

Navy Lt. Christopher Sharman, a February graduate of the Defense Language Institute Foreign Language Center's Japanese Basic Course, won third place in the 26th Annual Japanese Speech Contest held Nov. 14. in San Francisco under sponsorship of the Japanese Speaking Society of America (JSSA). He competed against 21 other contestants.

"His accomplishment is truly a reflection of his hard work and the support of the Japanese Language Department," said Maj. Pat O'Rourke, Assistant Dean of Asian School I.

"I spoke on the subject of nuclear non-proliferation," said Sharman, who is a native of Laguna Beach, Calif., and a 1998 graduate of the Naval Postgraduate School in Monterey. "I drew upon material I researched for my NPS master's thesis, which was titled 'Japan's Nuclear Options and U.S. Security Interests.'"

Sharman is a 1993 graduate of the University of California, San Diego, where he majored in political science and minored in Japanese studies. A participant in the university's Reserve Officer Training Corps, he received his Navy commission that year and went on to complete Navy intelligence training and flight school. He served as an intelligence officer in Misawa, Japan, for 22 months.

"It was an honor to participate in the speech contest," Sharman said. "I'm grateful to the Japanese Department for the encouragement I received to apply to enter and I'm grateful for the support I received after my application was accepted."

For placing third, Sharman received a trophy and a $300 cash award.

Sharman said each competitor spoke on a topic of his or her choosing, with a time limit of seven minutes imposed.

Winners were selected by a panel of seven judges, which included Japanese-language news media representatives, a Japan

Consulate official, and a regional manager of Japan Air Lines.

In accordance with contest rules, the competitors were judged for their ability to speak Japanese "with correctness, fluency and felicity of expression."

The annual competition is open to U.S. citizens over 18 years of age who are current or former students of Japanese and who have not resided in Japan for more than two consecutive years. Up to 25 qualified applicants are accepted on a first-come, first-served basis.

The stated goals of the JSSA are to disseminate information about Japanese culture and society in the United States, to encourage the learning of Japanese and to improve relations between Americans and Japanese through mutual understanding. Based in San Francisco, the society publishes a quarterly newsletter and has chapters in Mountain View, Stockton and Sacramento.

Soldiers invade Naval Postgraduate School twice

Story and photos by Bob Britton
Staff Writer

Soldiers from the 229th Military Intelligence Battalion and the Defense Language Institute Foreign Language Center invaded the Naval Postgraduate School before and after the annual Army-Navy football game in December. A few days before the big inter service game, soldiers ran from the Presidio of Monterey to NPS, formed in a horseshoe at NPS and sang Army football fight songs. The Army competitively challenged the Navy and said Army would beat Navy in the game.

Col. Daniel Devlin, commandant of DLIFLC and commander of DLIFLC and the POM, challenged the NPS superintendent and staff to sing Christmas carols at the POM if Navy lost the football game. He said Army would do the same if Navy won. NPS accepted the friendly inter service challenge.

Navy won this year's football game in Philadelphia. So, a few days before the winter exodus, Col. Devlin led the informal DLIFLC staff chorus singing Christmas carols to the NPS staff in the foyer of Herrmann Hall. Army won the previous year, so the Navy entertained the DLIFLC staff that year by Rasmussen Hall.

This year Rear Adm. Robert Chaplin, the NPS superintendent, asked Col. Devlin that the wager be made an annual event. Devlin accepted the annual wager of 30 minutes of caroling provided by the losing service. The winner provides lunch.

Before the annual Army-Navy football game, 1,200 soldiers from the 229th Military Intelligence Battalion at the Presidio of Monterey ran to the Naval Postgraduate School. They formed into a horseshoe shape, sang Army fight songs and challenged the Navy to sing Christmas carols at the Presidio if Navy lost the game. The Army would return the favor at NPS if the Army football team lost the game. This year, the midshipmen from the Naval Academy beat the cadets from the U.S. Military Academy at West Point.

Eagle Scout aims to keep Monterey Bay clean

Picture rock cod smoking cigarettes or boogie boarders getting tubed in motor oil and antifreeze. Well, what do you suppose happens when cigarette butts, papers, motor oil and antifreeze get tossed near or into storm drains along the coast?

Life Scout Dustin Kruse, working toward Eagle Scout status, hopes to make people think about that before they use the Monterey Bay as a garbage can. He led an effort Dec. 4 to stencil reminders on more than 180 Presidio of Monterey storm drains that flow into Monterey Bay, as part of his Eagle Scout activities.

Kruse planned and coordinated the task with Dewey Baird, chief, Utilities and Energy Division of the Presidio of Monterey Directorate of Public Works, and with Jennifer A. Hays, engineer, City of Monterey Public Works Department. The latter provided the paint, materials, traffic cones and safety vests.

Environmental Protection Agency-mandated Storm Drain Runoff Management plans require management practices that include public education, according to Baird. “The stenciling project is a big step towards that object, since public education is at the very heart of the solution.”

Kruse managed four crews of four people to prepare the surfaces, tape the stencils and spray-paint the message next to the storm drains. At the same time, Baird noted, he recorded the work completed for permanent EPA files and updated the old POM storm drain maps.

The crews included Boy Scouts, DLIFLC students and a couple of personal friends, Kruse said. They worked a full day, but had to return for another stint. “Even though we covered 160 drains — more than I’d planned — I still had to do a follow-up on 20 more drains to finish the project.”

People who never before noticed storm drains on the Presidio of Monterey can’t miss them now. Wherever there’s a blue duck and a warning stenciled on a white background — there’s a storm drain.

Boy Scouts Tony Dugone and Chris Duren spray paint a stencil on one of the storm drains at the Presidio of Monterey.

Retired Warrant Officer 4 Rick Howard briefs Navy volunteers at the Bayonet Course Clubhouse Jan. 14. Howard was one of the volunteer coordinators for the Catillac Invitational Finds National Kidney Foundation Golf Tournament held at Bayonet, Del Monte, Pebble Beach and Spanish Bay golf courses. About 370 DLI/FLC volunteers from the Naval Technical Training Center Detachment and the 229th Military Intelligence Battalion kept score for the golfers. See article on page 10.
